Speyside Single Malt 40
year old 40%

A similar story to the 30 year old. Despite a truly excellent nose, this time more sherry influences dominate: think of polished wood, damsons, and a little menthol/camphor and resinous oak. Once again, the palate seems to be slightly dumber than I'd want from a venerable whisky that should be about elegant, complex expression. It's balanced, just a little faded. Again, maybe higher strength might have done the trick. £140
